We Are All Born With Magic

We are all born with magic. You, and I. We are all born with magic. Some of us learn the harness our magic. Some of us are taught to disbelieve it is in us, to disbelieve in magic all together. Some of us are instructed of the opposite, they grow to believe they are mightier than the rest, and endeavour to take away the magic in others by force. To use their magic to overtake us, to violate us, to rob us of our magic, rich to capture all the great born worlds as it is and keep it for themselves, like dragons hoard gold and jewels.

There are those among us who endeavour to use their own magic to find and return the magic lost, forgotten, stolen or disbelieved to that person from whom it was taken. Some of these lose their way, our veins, our hope that there is magic in every breath that we inhale, and exhale, and believe they are mighty magicians driving away magic, or shunning their magic, to those poor folk born without it. In so doing they emulate those that take by force, they become like a dragon that believes themselves to be virtuous.

There are those that have had their magic stolen and cut about the earth stealing the magic of others in an attempt to get back their own. This is not the way, and is a hard truth to find.

There are those silent ones, who carve out the quiet life, and use their magic to their own ends, who use it to eat and be merry, and do not care for the ongoing theft or magic, so long as they have theirs to live by.

And so it is, but need not always be so. If we could only all remember how much magic we are all born with. How much magic we could all connect to only share. We have enough magic to feed every babe, we have enough magic to shelter every head, we have enough magic to drink clean water, to let it flow through every land. If only we could remember, if only we could all believe, if only we could let be, all the magic we are born with. You, and I.
